Read this carefully before you start writing...

Sometimes a good student who gets excellent grades may become a bad student who gets poor grades. There are many reasons why somebody may “go bad,” but few explanations on exactly what a formerly good student actually does in order to get poor grades. Have you ever thought about how a good student can purposely make himself into a bad student?

You must write a “process analysis essay” of approximately 200 words to explain what things a good student must do (or not do) in order to become a bad student! (As you know, a “process analysis essay” is a composition that tells the reader how to do something, perhaps using a step-by-step approach.) Your essay must include at least three paragraphs: an Introductory Paragraph (with a good thesis statement), a Developmental Paragraph (with topic sentences), and a Conclusion Paragraph (to summarize your entire essay). Try to be “ironic” in this essay and make it seem like being a bad student is a goal that everybody strives for, and you are here to teach us exactly how to be the best bad student in the world. You should take some time to write an outline of your essay before actually writing the essay itself. (100%)
