When the pop singer Cyndi Lauper accepted her high school diploma at the age of 35, she said: "The more you learn, the more you earn." Although Cyndi succeeded without a high school degree, most people are not so lucky. In the U.S.A. today, about 75% of jobs require some higher education or technical training not provided in high school. According to surveys, the lowest wage earners in the U.S.A. are those without high school degrees. Moreover, college graduates outearn those with college education and people with master's degrees are paid much more than those who only have a bachelor's degree. These survey results explain why the majority of young Americans go to college. However, despite the averages, more diplomas do not always mean more money. For example, many skilled blue-collar workers, salespeople, business executives and entrepreneurs have a much higher income than college professors and scientific researchers.

In future, cash will be used less and less. We may one day, live in a cashless society where all financial transactions are processed by computers without the use of cash. Transference of money will be through electronic fund transfer. The way we live will also be affected. We shall work shorter hours and have more time for leisure. There will even be no need to travel to work. Unemployment may also result. Many workers will be replaced by machines. People will need to be computer-literate and re-training is required for the people involved. There will be more computer crimes like theft of confidential information stored in computers, unauthorized manipulation of computer information, etc. Large sums of money are involved. The criminals are rarely convicted because it is difficult to catch/charge them. There is also the danger of more people knowing things we would like to keep private. The more information is stored in computer, the greater the possibility of it being misused or accessed by the wrong people.
